Michel Rein Brussels is proud to present Enrique Ramírez's 2nd exhibition at the gallery following Los continentes (2016).

« When I imagine a work, I try to project myself into a place I'm not acquainted with, a place which I would like to enter and be transported through... A place where darkness would help to better see the light of images, that light which is not only there to get us to travel, but which also invites us to share ideas, and ways of thinking, seeing, feeling, and listening... The sea is like a window looking out over this world of mysteries and opportunities.

The works in this exhibition try to answer these questions. They draw a map whose outlines are inspired by the upsidedown map (America Invertida, 1943) drawn by the Uruguayan painter Joaquin Torres Garcia. This illustration of South America upside-down has become a symbol of the efforts made by this continent to assert its central place. Joaquin

Torres Garcia put the South Pole at the top of the earth, like a visual statement of the importance of South America, offering another vision of the world and not the vision that the rest of the world tries to impose on South America.

When I think of my earth, I think of the sea. I think of a sea in the South American world, where the waters cling endlessly to what we call a terra firma. We have always been fluctuating, like a garden under everlasting construction, a world in constant conflict. We often have memories of vague memories, unstable images which our world is permanently altering, like a dispossession of history whose tale is never finished, like waves endlessly meeting the earth again and again... Mar mar mar... a repetition, an act of resistance. »
